Media -.The announcement yesterday that Derek Destefano would be taking over a role as a Kia Motors America's executive was no surprise to anybody. The article I linked to yesterday doesn't say anything about his last title, at Art + Commerce. But I did notice the comment from someone who has seen Destefano and described him as a dynamic personality who made a difference. Destefano's appointment doesn't mean anything for 2010, but it should cause some interesting changes around the industry. KMA has rebounded from some difficult times, despite an overall business environment that has seen a lot of global change. It will be interesting to see if KMA makes a decisive move into whatever direction MKT ends up taking.

Update (June 9): This article (with photo) from today says Destefano is also the new head of the Kia brand. Art + Commerce In the last several months I've had a few fascinating conversations with Kathy Hester, who founded the Art + Commerce magazine with a group of friends in 1985. She has talked to me about following her passion, and about how her business has changed over the years. Hester is a consummate entrepreneur, and she has a perspective on media that I was not totally aware of. I'm looking forward to connecting more with her, and reading the new version of Art + Commerce.

Technology and HR An article in this month's Folio magazine talks about the increasing importance of technology to HR departments, and the growing concern that the average HR department isn't doing enough with the technology at hand. A management consulting firm surveyed people to see what their expectations were of the HR people who manage technology for them. Using "cyber-attitudes" surveys, the company measured people's attitudes and expectations related to information technology. The results paint a picture of workers who feel they have lots of control over information they use, but who don't feel as confident that their employer is using that information to their
