Isolation is one of the most powerful ecological forces that shape mammalian evolutionary patterns. In the absence of gene flow, evolution is expected to take the path of adaptation to local conditions. Great apes are remarkably well-adapted to their African tropical environment, with divergent geographic ranges and a long history of natural selection. To examine the effects of ecological isolation in great apes, we compared global DNA variation with variation in the genes coding for the major histocompatibility complex (MHC), a key locus in the immune system. We find that human and chimpanzee MHC variation is similar to that found throughout the rest of the genome, and that the MHC of the African great apes is significantly more diverse than that of the Eurasian great apes. This pattern holds even within the major subspecies and species: within humans, there is more diversity in the MHC than throughout the genome, but this is not the case in chimpanzees. In humans, the MHC is in linkage disequilibrium with many additional MHC alleles, suggesting that the variation in the MHC has evolved in response to local adaptation. We propose that the pattern of linkage disequilibrium in humans is due to reduced gene flow among human populations. If gene flow was greater in the past, as is inferred from genetic variation in the rest of the genome, we would expect to see a greater correlation between MHC and other loci. We suggest that reduced gene flow within the human species has resulted in a mosaic of local MHC variants, which could facilitate local adaptation to new pathogens. 18 June 2016 | grixi 5 | Excellent Film Recently I have seen a number of articles on this site praising films of the 50's and 60's and the notion that they're some of the best films of all time. This is of course true if we're talking about movies like Psycho, The French Connection and Bonnie and Clyde. But when we start talking about films from f988f36e3a
